MAXED OUT: HOW THE WORLD IS GOING BROKE AND WHO GETS THE CREDIT

A worldwide financial crisis is here, and it's not going away any time soon. Each week the news seems to worsen, from the failing of major investment and commercial banks in the U.S. and the U.K., to turmoil in the currency markets nearly destroying the Icelandic Krona and undermining the Polish Zloty, to see-sawing costs of fuel and food around the world. Why is the global economy faltering and who will fix it?

TUESDAY, MARCH 3, 2009

FIXING THE GLOBAL ECONOMY

In part two of the three-part series on the global economy, Financial Times associate editor and chief economics commentator, Martin Wolf, explains why global imbalances cause financial crises, like the one ravaging the world now, and outlines the steps needed to end this destructive cycle. The author of Why Globalization Works, Wolf has been described as "the world's pre-eminent financial journalist" and named in Foreign Policy and Prospect magazines' "Top 100 Public Intellectuals" list. His latest book, Fixing Global Finance, will be available for purchase and signing at the program.

WHEN FAITHS COLLIDE: PLURALISM IN THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY

In the first program of the Spring 2009 Chicago and the World Forum series, "Fault Lines of Faith: Religion and Politics in World Affairs," renowned religion scholar Martin Marty discusses the resilience of religion in the modern world and outlines ways to confront the militancy and extremism that seem to be outpacing moderation and tolerance in the third millennium.
